present would have patience with him while he approached the subject gently, touching it at first only here and there, and that he hoped by the time he had finished his circumnavigation, he might land his ship inside the harbor, and tie it to the hitching post. Said he, "As I drove in this morning my old friend, who has so kindly conferred on me the honor of speaking to you today, called to me, and while I was unhitching my horse, he complained of feeling hungry. He finally said to me 'ok here, Thomas, do you know that Maj. Davis, of Camp Pike, United States Army, physician and surgeon, has been in this city for nearly a month, and that a member of our club, his honored father-in-law, has concealed his whereabouts, as well as the ingredients which go to make up a first class dinner, at which the Major might have come in contact with the elite of this College. He stated to me that he had been lying awake at night, thinking of the pleasant things which he would say on the occasion when the members were called in to meet the Major, and that he had read his form book on jokes though and had worked up some of the 'finest ever' which he thought would interest the Major, as he was born in Winnsboro, and people from over there had never been much educated in wit; and do you know, he further went on to say, that Uncle Jim, as he is sometimes called, has allowed the Major to leave under these circumstances, much to his, Col. Roche's, disgust, and that he had laid himself liable to have his conduct severely scrutinized. He told me though that there was a chance yet, as he heard the Major was to return before going back to another operation, and that he felt that it would be well to call our fellow members into conference, and tell Col. Stark that it seemed to us that, unless he intended to 'come across' the members of the faculty felt that he was 'fatally bent' on making a mistake. Having said 'I thank you,' orator Thomson took his seat.

Col. Stark then arose, and said that as he seemed to be the corpus delicti, as well as the General Curiosity of the meeting in his own proper person, and as Col. Roche seemed to him to be uninformed as to a few mitigating circumstances in the matter, he demanded to be heard. His chickens he said were not fat when the Major first arrived, and as they began to fatten, he found that his beloved nephew called in more and more frequently about meal time, and that nephew's mouth worked faster at uncle's table than the corn did on the chickens, so that he had as yet been unable to get completely mobilized and ready for action. He hoped he said, however, to get his breath while the Major was temporarily absent, and if he could get him in at night, and hide him out for a few days, he hoped to get enough steam ahead to climb a high mountain. He also stated that he was feeding the nephew on new sweet potatoes, fresh buttermilk, and cow peas, and that if he could keep things going as they were, he hoped to fill the nephew up to about his collar button, so that other invited guests might have time to unfold their napkins before nephew "general-curiosited" the whole dinner. This apology he hoped would be accepted and if it was, he said, "I crave the indulgence of this honored body, while I myself lodge a complaint." Col. Kerr having by this time taken his seat in the prisoner's dock, his uncle turned to him, and said: "There sits the man who is the author of our undoing, or in other words the man who has eaten up the dinner faster than it could grow. He is believed by me to have been to more parties, eaten more good rations at other people's homes, and furnished less himself than any man in this here house. He claims to love me well enough to eat at least two meals a day at my house almost every day. He brags about his mutton arrives, and he can eat more water at my home, than any man I ever saw. Now I think it would be a good idea as an introduction to the dinner I am to give, to have nephew show us a piece of his handiwork." He took his seat.

Col. Roche stood up in his chair and said that it did seem to him that Col. Stark had "spoke a parable," and having called Col. Kerr forward to the bar of the faculty, he solemnly sentenced him to give a dinner on next Thursday evening.

It is hoped all members will attend.

Plasco-Edwards.
